

Let's go to the theater

Today we went with Ann to the theater. It was awesome to see the stage, the curtains, the lights, and so many seats in the room! The play was very funny and full of animals—well, not real animals, but people who played the part of animals—and there were puppets that played the part of people. Everything is possible in the theater!

Curtain up

Once the play was over, we went with Ann and her friends to say hello to the actors. It was so exciting! Backstage there were many more people than onstage: The person in charge of the lights, the person in charge of the sound, the one in charge of the sets and props, the director of the play, and several musicians. And there were ropes, pulleys, trunks, props, and many other things everywhere!

Let's make faces

One of the actors, who was a bear in the play, told us that to act in a play you need to do only one thing: To represent just about anything.

For example, what face do you make when you are sad? And when you smell something nasty?

Paul makes an angry face; he covers his face with his hands, and when he takes them away, he looks very happy! Come on, let's make faces.
